Already the eyelids and best closed by the gentle hands of the woman, and moving towards the pulseless form of the victim, he made a hasty postmortem. To all appearance the last spark of life was extinguished, the extendible were cold and clammy. The tremities were cold and clammy. The pallor of death had settled on the feauses, and the undertaker was about to be notified when the weights were removed from the eyes. Into these the doctor peered and discovered a slight movement in the pupil of the eye. The physician was amazed, and ordered the bystanders to get a flash of whiskey. This was produced and applied to a place above the region of the bears. The women ruobed violently at the besom while the doctor lifted the arms and kept them in motion until the dead woman opened her eyes and turning her head surveyed the surroundings. The spectators looked at each other and then at the woman, who was eyeing them keen'y.
